The loaded gun concept

We find the best stocks by screening several companies that show potential for fundamental values such as insider buying and a solid balance sheet. For example, a company that trades less than cash on its balance sheet, and a price-to-earnings growth number below 1.0 may be a candidate for review. After our System has screened out all the overnight successes and tells us which company is fundamentally sound, we then look to the chart.

It is at this point that we unsheathe one of the most useful technical analysis tools in today's market, we call it the "loaded gun." The "loaded gun" is a powerful investment phenomenon, yet so easy to understand, you'll grasp it immediately. More importantly, you have strictly-limited risk. The way it works is simple. A flatline chart represents buyers and sellers in equal numbers. Every time the chart hits a resistance point - the sellers sell. This can go on and on until the last seller cashes in his chips. The only people left are the buyers. Then some catalyst, a news event, earnings, or whatever, creates that exact right moment to strike as people buy in droves, the stock takes off! Ironically, it is extremely safe. Worst case scenario, the stock will remain flat.

The hammer effect

We call it the "hammer" effect. Once you find the flatline, you're already in the arena, and the more the chart travels sideways, the more tension from your gallery. Your stock is at stake, and figuratively, you're about to strike the bull. The potential energy ultimately explodes, and the stocks soar.

you might as well get addicted to money"*

The Aastrom Example

There are several examples of how the “hammer effect” has worked in the past. Perhaps none is as glaring as that of Aastrom Biosciences (ASTM:NASDAQ). Aastrom is a company that works with stem cells. In the heat of the 2004 presidential debate, buyers and sellers had fought to a standstill due to fears of research restrictions. It was a "loaded gun" waiting for the hammer to fall.

We recommended Aastrom on Sept. 3, 2004. The "loaded gun" chart was exactly what you wanted. Take a look at what happened:

The trigger was pulled and the hammer fell on November 2. On January 2, the spark sent it soaring. We recommended that our readers sell on January 24 for a whopping 302% gain.

What does all this cost? For under $300, current readers are satisfied paying premium for a premium system. If they didn't, we wouldn't be giving it all away . It's much too valuable.

But we're betting that when you pile gain on top of gain, you'll realize that our regular discounted offer of one year for $295 will represent either the starting or turning point of your investments. Like a true matador, you will be earning your laurels.
